Those Little Motor Scooters  ............... By Doug Rohr

(A note on Doug:  Doug is still working; during the past 10 – 12 years, Doug has worked as one of our field service engineers supporting the Peace Krypton System for the ROK, and he has also supported the ARL system for the US Army. As such he lived and worked at several locations in the ROK. Doug has graciously provided this story and other tales of his Korean exploits.  Bill R)

The entire economy of Seoul is supported by little motor scooters. Yes, I mean those little 50cc things that sound like a lawn mower and college kids ride them on campus. Normally in the States, the only people that ride scooters are the ones that can’t afford a motorcycle or have convinced their wife that the cute little thing is not as dangerous as a big bad motorcycle. Over here, they have replaced the truck as the major means of hauling cargo through town and they drive RIGHT ON THE SIDEWALK! First of all you have to understand that almost every business in Seoul will deliver it’s products to your home and they use scooters to do it. You see them parked in packs in front of all the restaurants and every few minutes a kid will come running out with a big aluminum box containing someone’s dinner and he zooms off down the sidewalk driving with one hand and holding dinner with the other. There have been many days when I have struggled to walk down a crowded sidewalk and seen these guys weaving between the people. They drive them on the roads too, but that doesn’t qualify as a hazard to pedestrians so I’ll cover that later. So many businesses use these scooters that the owners modify them to carry more cargo. They weld pipes on them to form luggage racks to carry some pretty unbelievable stuff. I don’t understand why they stop short of welding roll cages on them. One of the most unbelievable things I’ve seen hauled on a scooter was a stack of propane tanks six feet tall. My first instinct was to hit the dirt and cover my head and shout “Grenade!!!” To make it even more interesting, this guy was riding on ice. Even if the thing didn’t blow up if he fell over, breaking the neck off the tank would have turned it into a pretty impressive missile. This is not an uncommon sight here in the winter since many homes and businesses use propane for heating. I won’t even begin to describe the fumes and the headaches that causes. There have been other strange cargos though. One day we say a guy with a refrigerator strapped on the back of his scooter. I don’t know how he was keeping the front wheel on the ground, but it violated every law of physics that I ever learned in school. He came to the corner and started to make his turn and I just couldn’t bear to watch. When I looked back, he was gone. Another strange cargo involved a custom here surrounding the opening of a new business. On opening day, a new business lines the sidewalk in front of it’s door with huge flower arrangements mounted on easels. These floral arrangements are gifts from friends and other local businesses and they look like the flowers you’d see at a funeral home. One day a scooter went by me with three of those babies strapped on the back and sticking up six feet in the air. I’m amazed that he didn’t arrive at the grand opening with an arrangement of bare twigs.

You get the idea!!
